

Detection of GW170817 and the observation of its electromagnetic counterpart across a wide frequency range is a breakthrough that was enabled by decades long detector development, strategic development of multimessenger data analysis, and theoretical advances.

In this talk I will discuss consequences of the kilonova observation and specific future directions that can shape our understanding beyond binary neutron star mergers.