

The so-called gamma metric is a static and axially symmetric exact solution of Einstein's field equations in vacuum that is continuously linked to the Schwarzschild solution via one parameter. We consider the possibility that astrophysical exotic compact objects might exist that are well described by such solution. We investigate some of their observable properties and the tests that could allow to distinguish such objects from black holes.